These days, we hear so much about what divides us. At any institution, there are labels that work to classify and separate individuals: race, age, class, income, political belief, religion. These mechanisms help in establishing individuals’ identities and in organizing society but can result in the loss of a universal, connected community. That relationship raises the question: How can a strong community be built and maintained without sacrificing individuality? The Interdisciplinary Studies program is located at the intersection of community and individuality. Through the endless support of faculty and peers, INDS seeks to enhance your individuality and makes you stronger as part of a team. Throughout the INDS program, there are projects that require the expertise of students across multiple disciplines; the INDS newsletter is just one example. The INDS newsletter came together through the collaborative, creative efforts of students and staff. Through the power of community, we can create things that would be impossible singlehandedly, and yet our individual skills and interests-our unique identities are enhanced as we proceed.